Tiszafüred is an agricultural village on the Northern fringe of the Lowlands, on the left bank of the Tisza, in the County of Heves. Of their craftsmen first the saddlemakers, then the potters acquired celebrity not only in the immediate surroundings of the village, but also in the more distant parts of the Lowlands. Both «Füred saddle» and «Füred pottery» became very much in demand in the markets of the Lowlands.

Before the use of earthenware, pewter, glass and china utensils became general, the Lowlands being an agricultural and always relatively well-to-do territory, employed very large numbers of the products of the potter's craft. Not only the cooking, baking, eating and drinking, but also the vessels used for keeping lard, dairy products, jam, flour, corn and other articles of the kind, were made by the potter. The great demand increased the prosperity of the Lowland pottery centres; in the past it was not a difficult matter to find farmhouses containing 80—100 products of the potter's art. Some of these utensils were used to decorate the interior walls until ousted by the products of the Apátfalva and Hollóháza factories.

Though in the argillaceous regions of the Lowlands there must have been a thriving pottery at all times, famous pottery centres being found everywhere (Mezőtúr, Hódmezővásárhely, Szentes, Debrecen, Tenke, on the fringe of the Lowlands Miskolc, Sárospatak, Belényes, Mohács, etc.), the supply of the demand was effected also by workers living in more remote districts, particularly by the Highland potters who wandered from village to village with loaded carts selling their goods in exchange for corn, usually obtaining for each utensil as much as it would hold. This barter trade is probably a very old custom. This intercourse in itself is enough to explain the similarity between the Tiszafüred utensils and those of the counties of Hont and Borsod. The decanters of human shape shown in our illustration (the so called «Miska») for instance were made also in the village of Mezőcsát in the neighbouring county of Borsod; fig. 12 shows one of these Borsod «Miska» dated 1847 included in our collection as one of the oldest decanters of the kind in existence. On the other hand, in respect of shape, colours, decorations, and inscriptions there is a similarity also between the Füred utensils and the other Lowland products, particularly those of Mezőtúr.

The most characteristic of the Tiszafüred utensils are those for holding beverages, which at the same time serve as drinking vessels: cans, flasks, noggins, jugs; most of these were made to order and therefore in many cases have their original owners' names on them. Other characteristic features (apart from shape, colour and decoration) of these utensils, as in general of the similar Alföld ones, are their inscriptions, usually in verse and often of so obscene character as not to bear printing, though they may be in place in a wallet or the sleeve of a frieze-coat.

The potter's craft of Tiszafüred, like that of the Lowlands in general is particularly noteworthy in ethnographical respects and in point of peasant art, because its historical development was not identical with that of the Highlands or Transylvania. The workshops of Nagyszombat, Zsolna, Kassa, Rimaszombat, Rozsnyó and other more fortunate Highland towns were able to enjoy undisturbed the benefits of the occidental style of technic of the XVI. and XVII. centuries, reaping particular benefits from the taste of craftsmanship of the German anabaptists from South Tirol, settlers in the Highlands who developed their eminent skill in many crafts — among others in pottery — under the influence of the Italian renaissance.

The chief reason for this differentiation in the past, the Turkish occupation of the country which threw difficulties in the way of an intercourse between the Highlands and the Lowlands, sometimes making such intercourse impossible, and checked the development of the cultural standard of the Lowlands. For instance we have no record of any lead enamel vessels having been made in Lowland workshops, or of brushes being as important as dropping dye in the work of decoration among Highland potters.

It is quite another matter whether the poor inhabitants of the Highlands ever purchased any of the fine products made in their part of the country and whether these finer specimens which originally too were very expensive have anything in common with folk-art. On the other hand it is certain, that the best products of Lowland pottery were purchased by the lower classes themselves, who according to the evidence of innumerable inscriptions actually had such vessels made to order, that meaning that the master had to consider the wishes and taste of his customer.

The less pretentious though ethnographically more noteworthy products of Lowland pottery being less showy in character were rather neglected by collectors and students of the past (most of them being amateurs) and were least appreciated in their publications. The present publication, by offering students abundant illustrations of the best work of one of the eminent Lowland pottery circles, is an attempt to make up for this undeserved neglect. We shall not be able to characterise the skill and stock-in-hand of the popular pottery of the whole Lowland plain until we have been able to present similar series illustrative of the work of all famous centres.

The objects shown in the illustrations below are in the Ethnographical Collection of the Hungarian National Museum, where they may be found by the inventory numbers (Inv. No.) given in the list. There are other collections of Tiszafüred pottery, which though smaller in number, are of importance, in the Miskolc and Debrecen museums.
